Breaking Down the Research on Women of Iraq dealing with Cyberbullying and Discrimination

By: Elena Bedoya

Introduction:

This article talks about women in Iraq being discriminated against and cyberbullied. Stating that women have little rights and are seen to be housewives. They have more time to be on social platforms than men do since men are considered the breadwinner. The research was conducted and a sample of women was interviewed. They each were asked questions based on their experience and what could be improved to protect women in Iraq from this type of crime. The researcher was contacted to interview with a small group of women about experience and prevention. They wanted to see if women agreed that certain laws and education would prevent women from being victimized by the Internet.

Review:

The principle of social science that is presented in this article is the lack of law to help women get justice or prevention. The government has there force on other crimes, and women are already subject to having barely any rights as it is. Many women have no to access any educational resources to prevent and protect their social platform and privacy on the web. As well as trying to change society and how women in Iraq have limited rights and are to be seen as stay-at-home moms.

The researcher method that was used to conduct this experiment was to pull a sample of 7 women to be interviewed about the experience they had when they were attacked on social media. Each woman was asked questions referring to their emotional state and physical. A hypothesis was made that if Iraq could provide law, education, and resources fewer women would be subject to being discriminated against and cyberbullied. Data revealed that women felt that if they had all this thing that they would have never been subject to being victim of this crime.

Conclusion:

In conclusion, the article talks about women in Iraq and how many of them have been discriminated against and/or cyberbullied on social media platforms. There was research done that used a small group of women to determine how they felt and what can be done to prevent it. Which touches on social science principles with criminal justice and education. In the end, data that was received determined the need for the improvement of Iraq laws for consequences and educational resources for women to prevent them from being victims of cyberbullying and discrimination.
