

In the article, "Social Cybersecurity, An Emerging National Security Requirement", I think it is eye-opening how information is spread and how easily people fall for false information. It is interesting but makes sense why other countries are infiltrating and work together to cause discourse within America, especially with our politics. With information also being so widely available, it is entirely up to the consumer to fact check and to make sure what they are looking up is reliable. It is a double-edged sword, with news media covering information, it is information that should be "trusted and vetted" but those same news media outlets have more bias than others. With information online, it is more work the consumer has to put to vet if the information is real.
