

In my opinion, the two main reasons individuals don't report cybercrime victimization are embarrassment and lack of trust in authorities. Victims may have feelings of embarrassment and blame themselves for what happened to them. They might fear that friends and family around them would criticize or judge them for their online mistakes, potentially harming their relationship. Due to cybercrimes commonly being committed online with no in-person interaction, cases can be difficult to prosecute and gather evidence for. There are techniques cybercriminals utilize, including VPNs and fake identities, to remain anonymous and avoid leaving traces of their crimes. In conclusion, cyber victims should be encouraged to report what has happened to them, and authorities should strive to lessen the rates of cybercrime.