

The video I watched, "Cyber crime spikes as holiday shopping picks up," relates to the routine activities theory as all three conditions in this theory were fulfilled. First, the motivated offenders in this instance were the scammers who were looking to take advantage of the numerous online shoppers during Black Friday. During Black Friday, there are many online shoppers looking for a good deal, making it easy for scammers to find suitable targets. Lastly, because hackers create their own fake websites and advertisements, it becomes very difficult to warn every potential customer about the risks associated with browsing these websites, as it is likely the good deal will lure them into clicking a suspicious link.
