

The article talks about how companies are changing their views on cybersecurity. It says that more companies are using policies that allow people to report security problems without getting in trouble. These policies, called vulnerability disclosure policies, help companies find and fix problems in their systems.

The article also talks about bug bounty programs, where companies pay hackers to find and report bugs. It says that these programs are becoming more popular, especially for smaller companies that might not have the resources to hire top cybersecurity talent.